

1. Darwin's theory is about how animals can change themselves if they have the will power. For example, if a fish wants to live on land, it can develop legs over time just by wanting to. This theory shows that animals can choose to change their bodies or habits whenever they need to adapt to their environment, like if a bird wants to fly faster, it can grow longer wings.